

If Black Had Shadow Poems: Exploring the Depths of Darkness

The Shadow

Soft as the bed in the earth
Where a stone has lain—
So soft, so smooth and so cool,
Spring closes me in
With her arms and her hands.

Rich as the smell
Of new earth on a stone,
That has lain, breathing
The damp through its pores—
Spring closes me in
With her blossomy hair;
Brings dark to my eyes.

William Carlos Williams

Helen Mitsios's poetry is a lovely synthesis of high culture and the beating human heart. She takes as her subjects and reference points European cities, literary and biblical figures, philosophers, mythology—but, in poem after poem, her intimate voice—tempered by doubt, pain, and love—speaks directly to us. Mitsios is one of my favorite poets writing today. -- Yehoshua November
