A collection of templates meant to be played impromptu by the artist. The gallery of opus and nocturnes were designed for the rhymer to explore, both in vocabulary and lyrical placement; "swing" or "swag" are not indicated in details.

The Rhymer's Template was originally written for experimentation and improvisational purposes. As the series progress, however, each piece begin to reveal the intentions of ghost writing for specific artists and remedying writer's block.

While battling the struggle of addiction to pain killers and prescription medication, the journey of artistry starts to reveal Zero's mind and body.

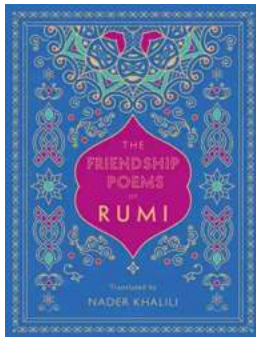

"The creative process at times manifests our demons and we tend to become our works, rather than our works as an extension of ourselves."
